Renton Regional Fire Authority prepared to combat COVID-19

During my COVID-19 update on Monday to the City Council, I was pleased to report "the relationship between the city and Renton Regional Fire Authority (RFA) has never been closer as we work as one unit. It is during times like this you really see how well things are working."

The RFA under the leadership of Chief Rick Marshall has been working very hard and strategically with other local departments to be prepared to respond to any situation.

They hold daily meetings with other departments, emergency medical providers, labor groups, ambulance companies and Harborview Medical Center to implement best practices and a unified message to the community. One of the group's chief is embedded in the county's emergency coordination center to help identify resources and assets in real time.

A deputy chief, who is also their health and safety officer, has been proactively working with senior care facilities in Renton, bolstering information from Public Health-Seattle & King County. This proactive approach has also established a direct line of contact with facilities.

They estimate their supply of personal protective equipment, including N95 masks, gloves and gowns, will last for six months at their current rate of use. Despite their precautions, four fire fighters suffered significant exposure to COVID-19 two weeks ago. They were placed on home quarantine and ultimately tested negative. There is a plan, in conjunction with other departments, to cover for any potential long-term absences.

We're fortunate to have this dedicated group of professionals on the front lines in the battle against COVID-19. They deserve our thanks and support.

There is one area where the RFA, as well as police, public works and Republic Services, can use your help: keeping our streets clear. With sheltering in place we have more vehicles than normal in our neighborhoods, but how they are parked makes it difficult for them to do their jobs. Their trucks need a minimum width of 12 feet to get by and Cul-de-sacs need to be clear for fire truck access. Your help in providing this access is greatly appreciated!

Baldwin's Family First Foundations aids COVID-19 relief

Doug Baldwin's Family First Community Center Foundation, along with Safeway, NW Harvest and other local organizations, have teamed up to bring immediate relief to local Seattle-area families and senior citizens adversely affected COVID-19. Doug reports they can use donations and delivery volunteers. Visit their website for more information. All proceeds will go directly to serving the community during this time of need.
